The European Union is facing many challenges. During the past few years, the so-called “Euro-crisis” has highlighted the fact that deeper economic integration cannot be maintained without steps towards a closer political union. While fundamental political decisions are on the agenda, there is a lack of public debate around these critical aspects determining Europe’s future.

Today, particularly for young people, Europe seems to be at once a daily reality and yet very abstract. Many of them enjoy the European cultural diversity and the freedom of movement granted by Schengen. While enthusiasm for languages, culture and encounters with fellow Europeans is ever popular, this trend has not automatically generated identification with the political structure of the “EU”.

An alarming fact is that some founding elements of the European project, namely mutual cooperation and solidarity as the basis for peace, economic growth and social welfare in all member states, are increasingly doubtful for young people. They not only are under the impression that their voices aren’t heard, but the persuasive power of 60 years of continued economic growth has been eroded by the impact of recent policies to counter the financial crises. Many people perceive these attempts as one sided and as a direct cause of social hardship for an entire generation.

All three elements – an ever-accelerating dynamic in European integration, the lack of opportunities to participate and dwindling trust in the EU’s benefits – have driven many EU citizens into the arms of euro-sceptical parties. For those who feel overwhelmed or threatened by plurality and economic change, the promise of an allegedly secure national state yet again has become seductive.

During the past months and years, many promising initiatives have reinvigorated the debate about Europe’s future. To further support this trend, the conference “Fwd: Europe” invites committed Europeans to present their projects, exchange experiences and develop new ideas to strengthen European civil society. Which projects and narratives of Europe promise to be successful in the future? What are the expectations young citizens have towards the EU? How can citizenship education for European democracy be shaped in the future? We kindly invite you to join the debate!

Information for participants

“Fwd: Europe” means: Forwarding and promoting ideas that are inspiring and worth spreading. You want to get in touch with other people, present your work or learn from the experiences of others?

There are different ways to join the discussions:

“Doing Europe” – prepare a pecha kucha presentation or propose a session!

The basic idea of the conference is to allow for exchange and networking among participants. In tracks 1 and 2 of the session “Doing Europe”, you can introduce your work in a Pecha Kucha presentation. Pecha Kucha means 20 slides are shown for 20 seconds each, 6 minutes and 40 seconds in total. Afterwards, there will be time to split up in groups for workshops and discussions. In the third track, other questions or ideas for cooperation can be discussed in an open space format. Participants are free to move between discussion rounds.

“Experiencing Europe” – Bring your European partners! Bringing partners from different countries together, is always a challenge. We want to encourage you to invite your partner organisations from European countries. For those who want to present a project, support for travel costs is available.

“Debating Europe online” – Join the discussion on Publixphere!

Before, during and after the conference, the political discussion platform publixphere.net will make your voice heard. Check out www.publixphere.net and join the discussions. Your ideas, questions and opinions will be included in the conference.

“Fwd: Europe” – Help promoting good ideas on social media!

The conference’s hashtag is #fwdeurope.
